Netanyahu rejects Trump's 15-point Gaza plan as Israeli strikes kill seven in Lebanon

Prime Minister Netanyahu has formally rejected the US-backed 15-point plan for Gaza, insisting on full Hamas disarmament — "the heavy weapons, the less heavy weapons, all the weapons" — before any further Israeli withdrawal, rather than the phased, reciprocal process Washington proposed. The rejection lands just as Jared Kushner's delegation prepares to arrive in Israel Sunday to push the plan forward. Separately, Israeli airstrikes on southern Lebanon killed seven people Friday amid 11 strikes across the country that day. Full story and analysis in the Israel & Middle East section below.

U.S. POLITICS

A quiet week on the floor — Congress still in recess

Congress remains in recess with only pro forma sessions this week — the Senate gavelled in and out in under a minute on August 13 — though 12 public bills and 3 resolutions were introduced during the period.

WHY IT MATTERS

A genuinely quiet week on the legislative floor is why the Supreme Court's emergency docket is carrying most of this week's Washington news instead.

SCOTUS & THE JUDICIARY

Trump brings White House ballroom dispute to the Supreme Court

The Trump administration asked the Supreme Court on Friday to let construction of the new White House ballroom continue while litigation proceeds, one week after a divided D.C. Circuit panel upheld a district court order temporarily blocking above-ground work. Solicitor General D. John Sauer called the block "extraordinary and unlawful," writing that the project — which replaced the demolished East Wing with a 90,000-square-foot ballroom — is "65% complete" with a 250-person crew working 20 hours a day, 7 days a week.

Judges Millett and Garcia found Congress, not the president, has exclusive authority over White House construction and never appropriated money for the project; the dissent, Judge Rao, argued the challenger — the National Trust for Historic Preservation — lacked standing to sue at all. The Trust must respond to the administration's application by noon Tuesday, August 18.

WHY IT MATTERS

This is a live separation-of-powers fight over who controls alterations to the White House itself, being resolved on the Court's emergency docket rather than through full merits briefing — and a case where the underlying facts (concrete "used in nuclear power plants," per the government's own filing) may make any adverse ruling moot before it can be enforced.

Still pending: mail-in voting and birthright citizenship

Two fights flagged earlier this week remain unresolved. The administration is still awaiting Supreme Court action on its stay request in the mail-in voting case, Trump v. California, after a second nationwide injunction from a Massachusetts federal judge. And the New Hampshire district court has not yet ruled on whether the Supreme Court's June 30 birthright-citizenship decision already forecloses Trump's new August 6 executive order.

ISRAEL & THE MIDDLE EAST

Netanyahu rejects the Gaza sequencing plan Washington built

Netanyahu has formally rejected the US-backed 15-point plan for Gaza, telling reporters "Israel does not accept the 15-point document" and demanding full Hamas disarmament — "the heavy weapons, the less heavy weapons, all the weapons" — before any further Israeli withdrawal. The plan itself called for a phased, reciprocal process: incremental Israeli redeployment tracking incremental, verified disarmament benchmarks. Netanyahu wants disarmament front-loaded and essentially complete before Israel's obligations begin at all.

ANALYTICAL READ

This is a sequencing fight, not a disagreement over the end state. Israel is trying to convert a parallel, reciprocal framework into a sequential one where Hamas moves first and alone — a structure that hands Israel's government open-ended discretion over when, or whether, disarmament is ever judged "complete." That serves a coalition whose far-right flank has said openly it doesn't need this agreement at all.

Israeli strikes kill seven in Lebanon amid Hezbollah friction

Israeli airstrikes on southern Lebanon killed seven people Friday, according to Lebanese state media, amid a reported 11 separate strikes across the country that day. Hezbollah leader Naim Qassem separately criticized Lebanese officials for "exposing the army to pressure" by implementing a US-backed security framework with Israel.

WHY IT MATTERS

Strikes at this tempo alongside a stalled Gaza track read as Israel keeping multiple pressure points open simultaneously, rather than concentrating leverage on a single negotiation.

Second targeted killing of a Hamas commander in two days

The IDF says it killed Hamas commander Hudhaifa Qawari in a strike in southern Gaza Friday, a day after a separate strike killed commander Jamal Mahmoud Abu Kamil in Gaza City.

WHY IT MATTERS

Continued targeted strikes during an active, US-brokered negotiation are worth watching as either deliberate leverage or a signal that the military track isn't pausing for the diplomatic one.

Kushner delegation still set to arrive Sunday — now walking into a rejection

Jared Kushner, Board of Peace representative Nickolay Mladenov, and Tony Blair remain set to arrive in Israel Sunday and travel on to Cairo for talks with Egyptian, Qatari, and Turkish mediators — now heading directly into Netanyahu's public rejection of the plan they are there to advance.

WHY IT MATTERS

The trip was billed as pushing the next phase of the Gaza plan forward; it now looks more like damage control. Whether Kushner's delegation extracts any sequencing concession from Netanyahu in person is the thing to watch this weekend.

"By agreeing to disarm, Hamas is trying to call Israel's bluff in Gaza"

Chatham House

Argues Hamas's conditional agreement to disarm is a calculated bet that Israel's stated conditions are effectively unmeetable, putting the onus of any breakdown back on Netanyahu's government rather than on Hamas. Directly relevant to today's lede on the sequencing dispute.

"Who exactly are the 'friends of the court'?"

Amy Howe, SCOTUSblog — drawing on Katherine Shaw, Cornell Law Review

Examines the Supreme Court's practice of appointing amici to defend abandoned lower-court rulings: of 24 appointments since 2016, 79% went to men, nearly all former clerks, and 83% came from circuits with Republican-appointed circuit justices — a case study in how an opaque, relationship-driven process quietly shapes who gets to argue before the Court.
